NLP in Teaching and Learning

Neuro-Linguistic Programming developed out of the field of Neuro-semantic and linguistics in the early 1970s. These fields studied the development and interaction of the brain and language.

Originally developed as a therapeutic technique NLP has become one of the most effective tools for improving learning.

The latest research into the human brain now means that the impact of teaching and learning can be studied and we now know for example which brain wave patterns are most effective for learning. NLP can precisely create these states through the use of language, behaviour and other activities.

NLP is introduced on many Cert Ed and PGCE programmes. However knowing about NLP does not mean someone is skilled in its use, just as knowing about driving a car does not mean someone can drive safely!

The programmes we offer are designed to intensely skill staff in the shortest possible time to use these skills to greatly improve classroom teaching and student performance.

We are undertaking a number of research projects and already have some astonishing results. Just for example we improved the spelling score of one class from 25% to 92% in 3 weeks using just 4 changes in teaching. We are currently working with schools and colleges to train their staff in these techniques to provide exemplars for other organisations.

Many schools and colleges invest a great deal in short training programmes, the problem can be that when a particular technique is used there may be little understanding as to why or how it works. NLP enables teachers to develop their own techniques based on core principles and be flexible in creating the right change for a particular pupil or student.

Your organisation will benefit from NLP trained staff with;

- A more effective and skilled workforce
- Better results
- Increased retention and achievement
- Effective classroom differentiation
- Inspiration for other staff and staff development and dissemination

Your staff will benefit by;

- Having greater enthusiasm and energy
- Being more effective with less effort
- Being able to manage stress and work pressure
- Gaining satisfaction from improved grades and results
- Learning a tool kit for communication that makes teaching elegant and fun
- More confidence and improved promotion prospects

We are happy to provide testimonials as to the effectiveness of these programmes from previous participants and their managers.
